On page 3, Bondi-Paganelli's (1996) study is not relevant because it looks at quantifiers while this study mainly focuses on generic structure. Also the author might want to look at Nesi and Gardner's (2012) book which aims directly at analyzing genres in higher education, using genre analysis and corpus linguistics. The selection of the books seems to be quite problematic. Based on the title alone, it seems that these two books are of two different genres. The first textbook seems to be more strongly associated with Explanation genre as it deals with explaining the principles. The second textbook on the other hand is likely to be of History genre. As the author claims that ideological position results in different structures, these two books have an issue since they belong to different genres and such discrepancy seems to be a more likely explanation for their different structures.

Another issue is related to the number of textbooks. Works in Swalesian's genre analysis are based on a number of texts in order to make claims about the generic structure common across various texts of the same genre. This study is based on 2 texts, which seems rather limited. The author might want to reconceptualize the aim and scope of the article. Perhaps this paper aims to apply genre frameworks in SFL to the analysis of two textbooks with different structures, instead of making claims about the generic structure of textbooks.

I was wondering if the researcher analysed the whole of the two textbooks. I can't find any parts of the paper saying that the analysis was carried out on some sections or chapters of the textbooks. If the whole textbooks were really investigated, explanations should be given how it was done as the data is huge and the analysis involved an inter-coder (who did the whole or parts of the analysis?) and macro and micro analyses.
