Abstract - Achieving justice is the obligation of every party, even the purpose of law is also built around the context of achieving justice. However, realizing justice is not something easy. In criminal law enforcement, justice should be given not only in the form of punishment to the perpetrator. Budi Sastra Panjaitan occurs because of the role of the victim who has provoked the perpetrator. This research was conducted using the normative legal research method and a qualitative approach. This study determined the relationship between provocations of victims in criminal acts and how justice is achieved between perpetrators and victims who have provoked the occurrence of the crime. This study established that that not all criminal incidents occur because of the wish of the perpetrator; there are times when these actions occur because of the provocation of the victim. There must be a change in Indonesian criminal law to bring about justice and make criminal law a remedy in crime prevention, namely by participating in providing legal sanctions to victims who have intentionally provoked the perpetrator to commit a crime and make themselves the victim.
